Why Study the Subject/what students Like about it

A language at A Level will improve your employability, in particular with companies with international branches. The course would appeal to those interested in language and communication, other cultures and ways of life, business, travel, literature, journalism, the media and international affairs. Many opportunities will be open to you, where you can continue to use and develop your language skills.

A language A level is one of the most diverse A levels that you could study as it covers everything from art, music, film, literature etc to history, immigration, politics etc in the Spanish speaking world (not just Spain!) as well as improving your knowledge of the language itself. There is something for everyone in this A level and past students have really enjoyed its diversity, no matter what other A levels they are studying or what their future career plans are.

Opportunities outside the classroom

The best way to support language learning is to visit a Spanish speaking country and immerse yourself in the culture while using the language. This is why we aim to take all A Level student to Spain at some point in the course. Past visits have involved a visit to Madrid where students were able to visit art museums, spend a day in a secondary school, visit a workplace and work on translation projects, go out for Tapas, visit a football stadium and generally practice their language skills.

Future progression/career routes

Some students go on to a degree course in languages, literature and/or applied languages (translating, interpreting); others pursue a course in another subject, for example Law or Business Studies, but study a language alongside it. Young people from the UK are increasingly opting to study abroad.
